Also:Â .Q: How does the "watchdog" program work on Ubuntu? I was reading about watchdog, and I'm having trouble understanding how exactly it works in Ubuntu. So, the standard watchdog daemon, as far as I understand, is started when the system starts up (the SystemD service, i.e. upstart). Then, if the system starts showing critical system faults, the Linux kernel sends a signal to the daemon, and it restarts the machine. Why does the kernel send the signal to the daemon? Why doesn't it simply re-boot the machine by itself? What kind of signals does the watchdog daemon receive? What causes the watchdog to restart the system? A: The reason for the kernel-level signal is because of signal handlers which can't be called from user-space directly. A signal handler cannot be used to trigger a system reboot, because a signal handler is only allowed to do certain things, and a system reboot is not one of them (see man signal, or signal(7)) man signal says When a signal is generated, it is sent to all currently registered handlers of that signal. If all have been called and have completed execution, and if their execution normally results in a return from the function, the process resumes directly at the location of the signal handler. Otherwise, the process continues at the next instruction after the signal handler. The signal can be used to exit the program. Even if there is a system function to reboot the system, that won't be activated. A: I'll add to @NathanB's answers by stating that a signal like SIGUSR1 has a user and a kernel representation. In user-space, there is no handler for SIGUSR1. There are only handlers for signals that are received with a specific value of signal number (SIG_DFL). The user-space handling of SIGUSR1 is implemented in, or triggered by, modules that get loaded at system boot, which are called uid 1 and uid 0, or uid.so and shm.so. The actual signals handled by user e79caf774b
