The advent of the Internet and email communication have brought with them the promise of convenient and cost effective communications. However, the advent of email communication and email spam has resulted in a problem of unsolicited email communication. Spam is email that is sent to large groups of people, often without the permission of the recipient, and includes often unwanted advertisement and offensive content. In some cases, the spam may include malicious computer code such as computer viruses. The spam is typically sent by automated software that is not aware that the recipient is not interested in the content. It is the recipient's responsibility to protect him or herself from unwanted content. The problem is that email users are inundated with spam. It is estimated that about 2% of the email traffic worldwide is spam. Many solutions have been proposed to fight spam. These include black lists and white lists. Black lists are lists of spammers and email addresses that have been obtained by the recipient. Black lists may be built manually by the recipient or provided by a content filtering service. Once a user has subscribed to a black list or a content filter, the black list or the content filter will identify and remove known spam email. White lists are lists of addresses or domains that a user wishes to receive email. White list addresses are identified and the message is sent to the user. This solution allows the user to specify which addresses are safe. The email filters have increased the efficiency of email. However, this method is not fool proof and spammers are constantly evolving to overcome spam filters. Another solution for fighting spam is to identify email sources, i.e., web sites that send spam, and block their ability to send messages. This method is relatively efficient but only works against known sources. The problem with this method is that the sources are constantly developing new techniques to outwit the anti-spam software. Another way to fight spam is to insert some hidden mechanism into the email that allows the sender to be contacted if the message is spam. This method has several drawbacks. First, the user must not only be aware of the hidden message, but also, must be willing to act on it. Even if the message is not spam, there is a cost involved in being contacted
