This invention relates generally to a golf club, and more particularly to a golf club having a hosel end with an extended shank portion extending from the hosel end. Golf club designers continually strive to design golf clubs that can assist in generating greater driving forces, which are essential for effectively striking a golf ball with as small a vertical impact force as possible. Accordingly, one target is that a golf club head with a long moment arm will generate a higher initial driving force. Another target of golf club designers is to design golf clubs having a high ball speed and low backspin rate upon impact with the golf ball. The ability of a golf club to generate high ball speed and low backspin is highly desirable for the higher individual golfer, as well as for skilled golf courses such as, for example, long par 3's and par 4's. Both of these goals are best achieved if a golf club head has an ability to withstand a significant force directed radially outward from the golf club head. Accordingly, a golf club head is contemplated with an enlarged shank portion, provided at the hosel end of the golf club head. Providing a portion of the shank portion at the hosel end of the golf club head results in an extended moment arm at the hosel end. In this manner, the golf club head is provided with a higher moment arm at the hosel end of the golf club head and can generate a higher initial driving force. In order to provide a higher initial driving force, the hosel end of the golf club head will typically be provided with a lower face center of percussion at the moment arm portion, as opposed to at the hosel. Such a configuration has the effect of lowering the face center of percussion of the hosel end, but does not necessarily cause the face center of percussion to move away from the center of the golf club head. In this case, the position of
