Chitinase genes were cloned from the leaves of Citrus trifoliata using the differential display technique. Nucleotide sequence analyses revealed that there are five chitinase genes in the Citrus genome. Three of these genes contain introns. The deduced amino acid sequences of the chitinase genes share 61-71% identity with each other. The estimated molecular weights of the mature chitinase proteins are between 30.7 kDa and 36.4 kDa. Northern blot analyses indicated that there are two chitinase transcripts in the C. trifoliata genome, each corresponding to the single chitinase gene. There is one chitinase gene in the Citrus sinensis genome, while there are four chitinase genes in the Citrus paradisi genome. Quantitative real-time RT-PCR analyses of the chitinase gene expression in the leaves of Citrus under normal and low nitrogen conditions indicated that the expression of the chitinase genes in leaves of C. trifoliata and C. sinensis is inducible. Q: Does the NTFS alternate data stream require a larger sector size than 512 bytes? I want to write to an NTFS partition using Python. It will be used by a Windows 7 client, and a Linux server. The idea is to write a compressed file to the partition, which will later be expanded on the Linux server. The partition's size is reported as being 600 MiB. The NTFS file size is also 600 MiB. When I try to use the current (diskpart) Python module, it complains about the sector size (0x10 = 512 bytes), which is the default. I have an existing NTFS partition that does not have an alternate data stream (ADS) and everything seems to work fine there. Does the ADS have to be larger? Is there a way to force Python
