Inhibition of Listeria monocytogenes by ginseng flavonoid-glycoside derivatives. Ginseng glycosides have been reported to have antimicrobial activities against a number of microorganisms, however, few systematic structure-activity studies have been conducted to better understand the mechanistic basis for these activities. In the present study, an Listeria monocytogenes (LM) infection in mice model was used to determine the ability of ginseng glycosides to inhibit LM in vivo. In addition, galloylglucose monomers, digallates and fructosyltransferase (FTase) substrates were synthesized to further elucidate the mechanism(s) responsible for antimicrobial activities. Ginseng glycosides are structurally complex containing a variety of saccharide moieties, including galactose, glucose, galacturonic acid, rhamnose and Xyl, as well as aglycones such as Ginsenosides Rb1 and Rb2. The sugar moieties could directly interact with the bacterial surface, thereby disrupting the outer membrane and the action potential necessary for extracellular metabolism. In addition, most ginseng glycosides exhibited good anti-LM activity and large fractions of naturally occurring glycosides of ginseng monomeric glycosides, digallates and FTase substrate showed high anti-LM activity. These results reveal that the inhibitory effects of ginseng glycosides against LM are structure-dependent, and suggest that monomeric ginseng glycosides are the most important anti-LM components of ginseng, and that the inhibitory effects of ginseng glycosides are mainly attributed to their sugar moieties.

Q: Can I display a texture on a rendered mesh without drawing it? In my context, a typical "cube" is defined by a collection of triangles, each of which has a material that defines the color of the surface (e.g. flat black), and its geometry is defined by a number of vertices and a UV texture. To create all the triangles in the cube I can use the following code: `void createTriangles(Mesh* mesh) { for (int x = 0; x`

Coronary artery fistula: diagnosis with adenosine stress myocardial perfusion SPECT/CT and review of literature. Cardiac catheterization is the mainstay in evaluation of patients with coronary artery fistulas (CAFs). However, cardiac catheterization has a number of limitations including radiation exposure and risk of complications. Myocardial perfusion scintigraphy with adenosine stress is an important noninvasive diagnostic modality in patients with suspected CAD. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the diagnostic accuracy of myocardial perfusion SPECT with adenosine stress in patients with coronary artery fistulas. The images of 37 patients with coronary artery fistulas (16 female, 21 male; mean age 52 ± 16.6 years) were retrospectively reviewed. The size, number, and location of the fistulas were recorded. The patients underwent conventional coronary angiography or computed tomography coronary angiography (CTCA), followed by myocardial perfusion SPECT/CT with adenosine stress. Myocardial perfusion SPECT/CT findings were correlated with coronary angiography and CTCA. In 18 patients, fistula was supplied by the left anterior descending coronary artery (LAD) and in 19 cases, by the right coronary artery. Of 37 patients, 24 (65.8%) had single fistula, 10 (27.1%) had multiple fistulas (two to six fistulas). The mean size of the fistulas was 4.9 ± 2.2 mm. Myocardial perfusion SPECT/CT correctly identified the location and the size of the fistula in all cases. However, it was not able to correctly diagnose the number of fistulas in 4 cases. Sensitivity and specificity of myocardial perfusion SPECT/CT for diagnosing coronary artery fistulas were 100% (95% confidence interval [CI] = 81%-100%) and 88.9% (95% CI = 79%-95%), respectively. In addition, sensitivity of myocardial perfusion SPECT/CT for diagnosing coronary artery fistulas was higher than that of conventional coronary angiography or CTCA. The findings of this study suggest that myocardial perfusion SPECT with adenosine stress is a noninvasive diagnostic modality with high diagnostic accuracy in patients with coronary artery fistulas.
