Among patients undergoing dialysis treatment, comorbid psychiatric disorders are frequent and often associated with poorer quality of life and increased rate of mortality. The main objectives of this study were to establish the prevalence of depression and anxiety in hemodialysis (HD) patients. Moreover, we investigate whether there is a relationship between specific dialysis parameters (quality of dialysis, calcium and phosphate balance, hemodynamics, volume control) with the presence of comorbid depression and anxiety. A cross-sectional study was performed. A total of 144 patients undergoing hemodialysis were evaluated for presence of depression and anxiety using the Beck Depression Inventory and the State Anxiety Inventory; comorbidity was evaluated using the Mini International Neuropsychiatric Interview. Depression was present in 15.6% of the patients and 46.9% had anxiety. Patients with depression were younger
