N,N'-Cyanamide-Based Photoluminescent Probes for Localized and Selective Detection of Amino Acids in Mice. β -Lactams and their derivatives have attracted increasing attention due to their physiological and medicinal significance. In this work, a series of β -lactam based cyanamide photoluminescence probes, (R-PNCY) (R = trifluoromethyl, 1; -2,2,2-trifluoroethyl, 3; -2-bromoethyl, 4), for the determination of amino acids in mice are reported. PNCYs can produce cyanamide under UV irradiation in the presence of NH_4Cl , which is accompanied with the detection of amino acids. Moreover, (3)PNCY can detect Tyr and Trp selectively in aqueous mice brain homogenate. In addition, the probe 3 can detect some other amino acids in brain tissue. The local penetration depth and the appropriate design of the probe will provide a powerful platform for amino acid detection in the living system.

Q: Do post-japanese-postmodernist languages have a word for pretending to speak a language that you don't know? I just woke up this morning and found myself unable to say anything in Japanese, and also unable to "act Japanese". I know that I know... We're both in the same room together, if we don't speak in Japanese, I'm not pretending to be Japanese, I simply can't speak at all. I was wondering what words there are in other languages that express this. I know that I couldn't think of the right word, but maybe someone else might have. I also found that some of the marks used to represent phonetic input may have a similar concept, like the "*ch" in Kanji, "*d" in Hanja and Hanzhi, "ŋ" in IPA, and "ph" in General American, but again, I don't have any more information than that. Any help is appreciated. A: I don't think the word exists in any language. I think most people would use something like that in their "native language". Our language has a "profession-ish" sort of prestige word: Mime: IMHO, that word is hard to Google for. A: Using a variety of Orientation-dependent modified-vapor-sensor-based fourier-transform-infrared-spectrometer for detection of pressure-sensitive tags. In this study, we demonstrate a modified-vapor-sensor-based fourier-transform-infrared (MVS FT-IR) system for the detection of pressure-sensitive tags. A continuous-wave (CW) thermal source generates infrared (IR) radiation within a sample volume and directs the IR radiation through a MVS FT-IR spectrometer. The MVS FT-IR system exhibits minimum sample volume (the purpose of gaining greater creativity by encouraging participants to free-associate ideas from images without pre-designated pre-generated responses. As a result, this type of problem-solving task yields more heterogeneous and more creative outcomes than traditional tests of abstract reasoning, which often focus on particular types of deductive reasoning tasks ([@B54]). Participants were not aware that they were working on a problem-solving task, but we know that non-specific factors such as social pressure can impact task outcome. Although we found no differences between the two groups on the trait measure of IQ, these results are in agreement with previous studies showing that low IQ is linked to deficits in creative problem solving ([@B14]; [@B45]; [@B18]) and that IQ improves with age ([@B62]; [@B13]). On the contrary, [@B61] reported that highly creative children displayed relatively higher levels of IQ and performance on problem-solving tasks. Other studies have reported the opposite. [@B46] showed that greater Raven's scores predicted increased generation of alternative uses among adults. [@B64] reported the reverse pattern; those who generated more domain-general effects of stimuli in the modified Advanced Remote Associates Task were more intelligent. Such variability in outcome is likely due to differences in age, IQ and other non-specific influences on task outcomes. Our findings add to a growing literature investigating levels of trait creativity in children. Previous studies found no difference in the ability to generate novel solutions to tasks in comparison to adults. For example, [@B13] found that there
