Q: How to check if the command line argument is already used or not in shell script I am working on a shell script and an argument called echo $1 How can I check whether this argument is already used or not. A: Simple! Just check what the output is. If it's some value, the argument is used, if ["$1" != ""]; then echo "yeah! $1 is used" else echo "nope!" fi If $1 is empty, the test will return a nonzero exit status of 1. Note that this test is much better written as: if ["$1" = ""]; then echo "yeah! $1 is used" else echo "nope!" fi The - introduces a string parameter, and the " denotes the beginning of a string parameter. Basically we are looking for $1 to be empty (non-empty), and then checking that the empty string isn't the special (aka empty) string. It is common for wheeled vehicles, such as automobiles, trucks and other four wheeled vehicles, to have a first braking system which is operable for braking the vehicle upon a loss of electrical power or braking power, commonly known as an emergency braking system or a "fail-safe" braking system. The emergency braking system is capable of braking the vehicle upon loss of electrical power. After loss of electrical power, the emergency brake is the only brake and is typically a disc brake having a disc and a pair of brake pads. In addition, such vehicles typically have a second braking system operable for braking the vehicle when a driver applies pressure to the brake pedal, commonly known as a power-assist braking system or a power-assist braking system. The power-assist braking system is capable of assisting a driver in applying pressure to the brake pedal, when the driver is not exerting enough pressure to brake the vehicle. Typically, prior art power-assist braking systems receive a signal from a vehicle controller that indicates a driver is applying a desired degree of pressure to the brake pedal. After receiving this signal, the power-assist braking system provides additional pressure to the brake pedal if the driver is not applying sufficient pressure. Thus, the power-assist braking system serves to increase the amount of pressure the driver must apply to

Asbell has been in the Surface Pro business for less than a year, and he is well aware of the value of a quality keyboard and mouse combination. In fact, at the device's launch in the UK back in November 2014, he went on to say, in a post on the Surface Blog, that the Surface Pro 3 keyboard and mouse combo would sell for a total of £400. Today, when setting the Stage 1 at TechRadar, we asked Asbell about his original £400 figure. We wanted to see whether he'd stick to it in the age of the latest generation of laptops. And, when we asked him if he had any plans to re-launch the Surface Pro 3, he went one further than before and said: "If you believe everything you read on the internet and comment on it, yes we will." Our original post included a screenshot of the original £400 price, but Asbell told us: "That's not set in stone yet, nor for the next Surface Pro models." The Surface Pro 4, which is said to have a more powerful, 14.6-inch PixelSense display and Intel's latest Kaby Lake processor, will reportedly start shipping in the fourth quarter of 2016. Asbell told us: "I'm happy to share that we're talking to distributors at the moment and we're likely to introduce the new Surface Pro into the UK before the end of the year. Hopefully it will be right up there with the Surface Pro 3." And if you're wondering just how well the Surface Pro 3 is selling, Asbell told us: "We're very happy with the product and the feedback we've had so far. From what I can see, it's doing really well." But that £400 price tag, and whether that will still hold true when the Surface Pro 4 launches, is something that Asbell said is something for Microsoft to decide. "There's no particular reason why it should," he told us. "Anything's possible, of course. But we're committed to it [the £400 figure], that's for definite." The Surface Pro 3 is available now from Microsoft's online store in the UK, priced from £429 for the 64GB version. Recently, with the development of network technology and the increasing demand for sending multimedia content, the growth of the Internet user base and the number of users using multimedia content services have increased. In order to effectively provide a variety of content-related
