It is important that you get started with a tutorial that teaches you Photoshop and Photoshop Elements the way you'd like to learn them. Before committing to more than one tutorial or book, be sure that you know the basics of using Photoshop and Photoshop Elements. You can read more about using Photoshop in the Tutorials section at the beginning of this chapter, and you can find a list of Photoshop-related books on our Books for Designers, Artists and Photographers page at www.sybex.com/go/dwainc/. GIMP (GNU Image Manipulation Program) This is another image editing program that is built on a very similar model as Adobe Photoshop and Adobe Photoshop Elements. However, it has a much smaller user base and has been touted as a free alternative to Adobe Photoshop. If you like the look of Photoshop and Elements, GIMP is worth a look and try. Most newer GIMP users are very familiar with how Adobe Photoshop works because of its similarities. GIMP supports layer-based editing, but the user interface is much different. In addition, there are some unique editing functions that are unique to GIMP. It even has an image-viewing mode called gqview and a movie-making tool called Movie-Dump. You can find a short list of books that teach GIMP and Adobe Photoshop in tandem at www.sybex.com/go/dwainc/photoshop. Apple's Aperture Apple's Aperture is another powerful desktop image-editing program. It is very similar to Photoshop and can export to Photoshop format (.psd). However, Aperture's unique star in this tool is its integration with Apple's iLife suite of programs, which include iPhoto, iMovie, and GarageBand. With Aperture, you can import photos and easily edit them using that program's tools. And the other programs in the suite are even integrated with Aperture, so you can easily edit your project in iPhoto, for example, and then export it to Aperture for upload to your website. And if you use iPhoto to make iMovie, you can add music and use the cool effects you've created to edit your video. You can find more information about using Aperture at www.apple.com/ipad/photography/. iPhoto iPhoto is part of Apple's iLife suite of programs, and it is an

HALIFAX — University of New Brunswick law students are taking on a Canadian fossil fuel giant over its land use practices in New Brunswick, alleging they are a threat to a historically significant watershed area and the nature of the landscape and social justice. About 30 students from the UNB and University of New Brunswick School of Law participated in two days of legal workshops this week in Saint John. They said they are watching and learning from the legal proceedings against Imperial Oil Corporation over the Atlantic Deep Water site on the Bay of Fundy, where a pipeline and processing facility for oil extraction and refining are set to be built. The university-based groups said they fear the planned facility in Saint John will degrade the Bay of Fundy, the largest estuary in the world, which extends from Saint John to the mouth of the river, a distance of more than 40 kilometres. The College of Law students want a preliminary hearing for the case, in which they will argue the proposed pipeline, which will carry 1.2 million barrels of oil per day and create approximately 900 jobs in the area, must be stopped. But the UNB group said they fear the project will negatively impact the nature of the landscape. They said they also want to shift the way the debate about renewable resources is framed, because they said it has so far been about a small minority of right-wing ideologues versus a huge, well-funded oil industry. “We see that we are living in Canada with the largest oil reserves, with the largest tar sand, and yet we have a completely diminished set of options to move towards a cleaner energy future,” said Zach Cavanaugh, one of the leaders of the action group. He said the UNB group will continue its legal efforts against the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency (ACOA) and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources (EMRD) for their consent to the project. But he said the issue of social justice is not only about “oil and gas, it’s about jobs, it’s about climate change and it’s about infrastructure that we need for our future.” The ACOA gave its approval for the project in November. The university-based group planned the legal workshops as part of a broader campaign to raise awareness about their concerns. The social justice component of the workshop was organized by students with the Society of Environmental Journalists and the Students for a Clean

Q: WPF TreeView Hierarchies I have an object graph with 2 levels of dependencies, 1 top level with sub-objects and 1 level of "child" objects that is 1 level below the top level. So there are two levels of hierarchies. I would like to represent this hierarchy with a WPF TreeView. What I am trying to achieve is on the level of the "top" objects the user can traverse the branches of the tree but have no 'child' level, so if they were to click on an "Object" in the treeview it will just select that item and not navigate to the next "Level" in the graph. Does anyone know if this is possible? A: The only "treeview" style available is the "dendrogram" style, which unfortunately is not what you need. In that style, the children of a node are immediately visible and can be selected, however, when you select the parent node, you will not be taken to its children. What you should do instead is use a normal treeview, with a checkbox for each item. Either use the MVVM style to prevent the checkboxes from being checked, or bind a IsExpanded property to the checkbox to set the checkbox to its checked state. Randomisation to the intervention arm, including missed appointments, is more common in children with asthma than in those without asthma. Cases with asthma are known to have higher and more varied admission rates than those without asthma. It is possible that cases of asthma might be more often referred to palliative care due to the lack of appropriate specialist services in the region in which the study was conducted. The aim of this study was to examine the correspondence between the patient's diagnosis of asthma and randomisation to the intervention arm of a trial of the management of childhood asthma, in order to assess the potential bias in the data. Children were recruited from the emergency department and outpatient services of one hospital and from paediatric urgent care centres in an outer suburban area of Western Sydney. The research team were blinded to treatment allocation. The information we examined was that included in an information sheet for the emergency department and paediatric urgent care patients. In both groups, the number and proportion who were randomised to the intervention arm and missed appointments are broadly in line with the original intentions. However, although patients without asthma were more likely to be missed than those with asthma, this was mainly due to the fact
