Confronting the implications of thymic stromal lymphopoietin production by adipose-derived mesenchymal stem cells in a mouse model of allergic rhinitis.

Mesenchymal stromal cells, including adipose-derived mesenchymal stem cells (ASC), are widely used in cell-based therapy. In previous studies, we showed that a single injection of ASC transplantation in murine models of asthma decreased the Th2-type cytokine, IL-5, and IgE secretion. However, we also showed that the levels of the proinflammatory Th1 cytokine, TNF- α , were increased by the injection of ASC. The immunological mechanism underlying the different responses of the ASC toward Th1 and Th2 cytokines remains unclear. Here, we tested the hypothesis that the ASC-mediated production of the cytokines IL-13 and thymic stromal lymphopoietin (TSLP) are responsible for the different effects of the ASC on Th1 and Th2 cytokines. In this study, we prepared C57BL/6-transgenic TSLP-deficient mice and investigated the role of TSLP in ASC-mediated airway inflammation. Our results showed that the TSLP-deficient mice were resistant to ASC-mediated allergic airway inflammation, and ASC-mediated production of IL-13 and TSLP was confirmed in vitro. Furthermore, neutralization of TSLP in a mouse model of allergic airway inflammation led to a reduction in the production of IL-5, IL-13, and IgE compared with the control IgG. Conversely, we found that IL-10 was not produced by the ASC. These findings indicate that ASC provide an important source of IL-13 and TSLP and may thus be a potent therapeutic target in the management of allergic airway inflammation. The present invention relates to a system for preventing paper or sheet material from being counterfeited and in particular from being counterfeited by use of a fraudulent document. Bogus documents are produced with a view to exploiting the document's unusual features and are in particular printed with an unusual background or printed on paper having an unusual characteristic. It has been found that the anti-counterfeiting features present in the surface of a genuine document will often not be sufficiently prominent on the surface of a bogus document. In order to make the bogus document a convincing document, it will have the appearance of a genuine document. It
