There was a release in the early 1990s that included references to acquiring DICOM data from other. com file as a text file named DCM.The role of bed-sharing in nosocomial infection. Although the recommended technique for contact isolation is separation of the infant from the mother, the practice of bed-sharing by the mother, who then practices intimate contact with her infant, has been advocated for the prevention of nosocomial infections. This discussion examines the process of care for an infant and maternal bed-sharing from the perspective of the frequency of maternal-infant skin-to-skin contact, data documenting that duration of skin-to-skin contact and number of diaper changes were not associated with nosocomial infections, and data that suggest that skin-to-skin contact with the infant does not decrease the duration of mother-infant separation. Although no controlled study has demonstrated a reduction in nosocomial infection with bed-sharing practices, the use of such practices has been common in many industrialized countries and may well decrease the frequency of nosocomial infections. Further study is needed to demonstrate the efficacy of bed-sharing practices.
