A rapid method was developed for the fast and simple enrichment of bioactive flavonoid compounds from herbal infusions on a poly(dimethylsiloxane) (PDMS)-modified coated mesoporous silica (MSM-PDMS) material. The MSM-PDMS material was prepared through a one-pot hydrolysis-condensation method, in which a mesoporous silica (MSM) material with a high specific surface area was coated onto PDMS. The prepared material showed a combination of properties of homogeneous distribution of silica nanoparticles on PDMS with a mesoporous structure, which was much larger than that of unmodified silica materials. The analyses of the distribution of silica nanoparticles on PDMS indicated that these nanoparticles were homogeneously distributed on PDMS as a result of the interfacial interactions between the PDMS and mesoporous silica nanoparticles. Under the optimized conditions, the hydrophilic PDMS-coated silica nanoparticles allowed the enrichment of hydrophilic flavonoid molecules from an herbal infusion. Compared with the unmodified silica material and commercial hydrophilic silica column, the PDMS-coated silica material could effectively remove
