The present invention relates to the field of programming with distributed data structures, and more particularly to a peer-to-peer programming model for data-structures that is particularly suited to distributed programming and programming on a cellular robot platform. Distributed programming is an approach to programming that takes the resource availability into account. These resources include one or more data structures that are distributed over a set of nodes (the nodes being computers or processors). Data structures are used in computer science, mathematics, and software engineering to represent data objects. This type of representation may be referred to as a data structure, or structured data, in contrast to the more ad hoc collections of data described by a programming language. Some data structures are described as being implicit or explicit; implicit data structures may be data-dependent upon user inputs, whereas explicit data structures may be explicitly enumerated in a source code module. As used in the art, an index is a data structure that can be used to store a list of values. The value in a value list indexed by a particular index (indexable list or indexable set) represents that particular index value or object (commonly referred to as the index). Many methods of data manipulation are based on manipulation of data structures and data. An index is a collection of variables that, when accessed, can return a value representing the state of that collection of variables. An index is a collection of variables that has been arranged for efficient access to a value or values thereof. An index is a list of values (each indexed by a particular value). Cellular robotics is the branch of robotics that applies computing technology and control theory to mobile robots. The most common approach is to design mobile robots that operate on a mesh network of mobile robots, with each robot having a network interface such as a wireless transceiver. The mesh network provides a robust connectivity for the mobile robot. Generally, the mesh network consists of a set of mobile robots and a set of fixed master nodes, or base stations, which provide communication links (e.g., internet access) to the mobile robots. In such a network, the mobile robots communicate directly with each other, but not with the base stations. In most mesh networks, routing is performed in an on-demand fashion. This means that, at any given time, a given robot may be connected to a number of base stations. Upon the detection of a change in the network topology, the robot may transition to a new base station, depending on the location of the new base station
